THIS Dictionary is one of the numerous works prepared under the auspices of the Honourable the East-India Company, for the use of their servants in the East. Being intended for the ordinary business of life, its highest aim is practical utility; and in this point of view it is hoped that it will not be found deficient in comparison with other works of a similar nature. The wants of the student in the Bengálí language are those that have been first considered; and every endeavour has been used to render this at once more elementary and detailed than any other Bengálí dictionary hitherto published, the compiler's great object having been to adapt it to the use of the beginner, though he trusts it will also prove accurate and critical for the accomplished student.

Two different styles of writing prevail in all the languages of India. The first, which is popular, and may be termed colloquial, is, like the French and other dialects derived from the Latin, limited in its extent. The other, on the contrary, borrows freely, at the will of the writer, from the Sanskrit; and thus to such a degree, that, but for the inflections of the verbs and nouns, it might be considered as the latter nearly unaltered. Owing to this peculiarity it is indispensable that every dictionary of a Hindu dialect should contain, not only what is purely colloquial, but likewise such erudite and scientific terms as learned or pedantic writers may think fit to adopt. It will hence be perceived what are the difficulties attending such a compilation as the present, for the complete execution of which a considerable knowledge of the Sanskrit language is evidently indispensable. Without this advantage a compiler will be unaware of many terms which are actually in use; and will be wholly incompetent to select, from the inexhaustible stores of that language, such words and phrases as are most likely to be employed by a writer of any pretension to learning. If, therefore, the corrupt terms employed in the colloquial dialect were withdrawn from such a work, it is clear that the remainder would prove a very serviceable Sanskrit dictionary for those commencing the study of that language.

To secure that purpose in the most effectual manner, all the terms occurring in the Amara-Kosha, with large additions derived from other sources, have been incorporated in this work. It contains not only such words as were supplied by the compiler's private reading, but such also as are furnished by the Asiatic Researches, the Transactions of the Royal Asiatic Society, the masterly productions of Mr. H. T. Colebrooke, and the learned works of Professor Bopp, of Berlin. From these various sources more than forty thousand terms have been selected and explained. Hence, perhaps, many words connected with science and religion, which have moreover the advantage of an exact reference to the sources from which they are taken, will be found in this work, that are not to be met with even in the enlarged edition of Professor Wilson's valuable Sanskrit Dictionary; and the list of the authorities will shew that some pains have been taken to include in the present work all the information on the subject which could be obtained at the time it was sent to press.

So large a mass of Sanskrit words having been thus brought together, it appeared to the compiler that, though the genders are but rarely required in Bengálí, their insertion would be neither useless nor superfluous. In a grammatical point of view, they are highly important for the student of Bengálí in the higher style of compositions, who thus becomes acquainted with the etymology and purity of the language; and the Dictionary is by this means rendered equally available to the Sanskrit student. It was likewise hoped that, by shewing the Beng. student, who had made much progress in the language, what an extensive basis he had laid for the acquisition of the Sanskrit, he might be encouraged to extend his studies to that interesting and primeval tongue. For these reasons, the gender of every pure Sanskrit word has been inserted; and keeping in mind the same principle, all the roots of the Sanskrit language have been given in alphabetical order, including their compounds formed by the addition of prepositions, and specifying the voices, common or proper, in which they are used. Nearly all the distinctive terminations occurring in Sanskrit and Bengálí are also given. Those of the former language have the advantage of exact references to the excellent grammar of Sir Charles Wilkins. And that nothing might be wanting to make the work as extensively useful as possible, an Index has been prepared with considerable care, containing about thirty thousand references to the most popular senses of the words of both languages. As all these terms are admissible into the Bengálí language, this Index will doubtlessly prove highly serviceable to the student, and supply the place of a reversed dictionary; while it cannot but be of great use to the Sanskrit scholar, who has here, for the first time, a copious list of popular and pure Sanskrit words, carefully distinguished from such terms as are only employed in the Bengálí dialect. The man of science, likewise, will be gratified by finding a reference to all the words relating to botany, &c.

On the grounds here stated, the present work may be found useful, as a book of reference, even to professed scholars, on account of the mathematical, philosophical, botanical, and other scientific terms which it contains. But it must not be supposed that it is only when authors' names are expressly quoted that their works have been consulted. To the labours of Sir Charles Wilkins, Mr. Colebrooke, Professor Wilson, Dr. Carey, Professor Bopp, &c. this work is under continual obligations, even when no allusion is made to their works. Their names have been given only where the article was altogether borrowed from one or more of them, or when the information rested solely on their authority; and the author has to regret that the second edition of Professor Wilson's Sanskrit Dictionary did not reach this country before the printing of his own was nearly concluded.

Having thus explained the general objects and contents of his work, it remains for the author to acknowledge how much he owes to the kind assistance of his friends. To Mr. John Shakespear, who read over nearly the whole of the sheets as they passed through the press, he is indebted for the detection of some verbal inaccuracies which might possibly have embarrassed beginners. Mr. Felix Seddon, Professor of Oriental Languages in King's College, London, who possesses so extensive and practical an acquaintance with the native dialects spoken in Bengal and the adjoining provinces, had the kindness to mark the most useful popular words referred to in the Index: and Dr. Rosen, formerly Oriental Professor in the London University, demands the author's particular acknowledgments for the unremitting pains bestowed by him upon the work from its commencement to its termination; nor indeed without his most valuable assistance could the author, from the state of his health, have hoped to carry it through the press. To his friend Sir Charles Wilkins thanks are due for the loan of three MS. lists of words collected during the course of that distinguished scholar's studies while resident in Bengal. With all these advantages, it is not perhaps unreasonable to anticipate that the work will be found worthy of the patronage of the enlightened body at whose expense it has been published.

In assigning etymologies, the proximate source has always been given, but, to avoid repetition, without the corresponding English term, which must be sought in its proper place in the Dictionary. When any doubt existed as to the origin of Sanskrit words formed by means of the Unádi and other suffixes, they were omitted. The same rule has been followed with regard to other etymologies that appeared fanciful; but when there was any probability in their favour, they were inserted with a note of interrogation.

The author having avoided on principle the introduction of any of his own views which have not yet received general assent, has strictly adhered to the opinions of his authorities. What he has said, indeed, in his Bengálí Grammar on the subject of the Prepositions, has received the approbation of some distinguished scholars; but still he conceives that till his views have been generally adopted he would hardly be justified in giving them an exclusive preference. At the same time, to afford the scholar an opportunity of making his choice, he has given his own ideas on the subject in a separate form. It appeared to him that the Prepositions in the Sanskrit language have such peculiar powers as to render them worthy of an investigation conducted on philosophical and philological principles.

Words often occur that may be equally claimed as belonging both to the Bengálí and Hindústání languages. In such cases, as a general but not invariable rule, the Hindústání form will be found given as the original.

The orthography of Bengálí words is not always fixed by custom; and the three letters শ, য়, and ঞ are used at pleasure for each other, particularly by popular writers. The student must therefore be prepared to refer to the other two letters, when he does not find a word for which he is seeking under the first. Similar difficulties will occasionally occur in other words, particularly when they are adopted from the Arabic, Persian, or Hindústání; but a little use will produce facility in discovering them.

The proper form of the Bengálí verb corresponding to the English infinitive, is, in this Dictionary, given for the first time. Thus কৰিতে is given as to do; and not কৰণ which is the verbal noun, and means the doing. Much space has been saved by inserting ডা and ড় the signs of the abstract noun, immediately after the concrete noun or adjective; e. g.

অভদ্র (mfn. অ+ভদ্র) Not good, not auspicious, not salutary. —ডা (f.) or —ড় (n.) Badness, mauspiciousness.

Here the hyphen before ডা and ড় shews that either of these terminations may be joined to the adjective অভদ্র and thus form the abstract nouns অভদ্রডা (f.) and অভদ্রড় (n.).

Sanskrit roots with the anubandha ড in the native lists, are in this Dictionary written without the vrāma under the final consonant: e. g. R. অংশ.

The Bengálí alphabet makes use of the letter ব to express the sound of the two Devanágari characters ब and व indiscriminately. In order to obviate the inconvenience which might hence have arisen to the Sanskrit student in consulting the present work, an asterisk has been prefixed, under the letter ब, to those Sanskrit words which, in the Amara-Kosha of Mr. Colebrooke and in Professor Wilson's Sanskrit Dictionary, are written with an initial ब. If व occurs in the middle of a derivative or compound word, the etymological analysis will, in almost every instance, be sufficient to determine whether that letter is the representative of the Sanskrit ब or of व. In cases where ब is immediately preceded by a mute m, care has moreover been taken to express the latter sound by म्, if the Bengálí ब stands for the labial consonant ब, and by anuswára whenever it represents the semivowel व: an orthographic distinction which is left to the option of the writer by the native grammarians. Those Sanskrit roots which are in the most approved dhātupāṭas or lists written with a final व् are accordingly here enumerated.

अव्, अम्ब्व्, अर्ब्व्, कूव्, कूट्म्ब्व्, गम्ब्व्, गर्ब्व्, गम्ब्व्, गर्ब्व्, घम्ब्व्, घर्ब्व्, ठम्ब्व्, ठर्ब्व्, टीव्, टूव्, उव्, डिव्, डूव्, उम्ब्व्, उर्ब्व्, डूव्, नम्ब्व्, नर्ब्व्, पम्ब्व्, पर्ब्व्, पूव्, बम्ब्व् (बम्ब्व्), नर्ब्व् (बर्ब्व्), मम्ब्व्, मर्ब्व्, बव्, लव्, लूव्, शम्ब्व्, शर्ब्व्, शूलव्, मम्ब्व्, यर्ब्व्, जम्ब्व्, जाम्ब्व्.

Of these only the roots टूव् (टूम्ब्वति) “To kiss,” and लव् (लम्ब्वते) “To hang from,” are of common use as verbs.

The list of errata has been prepared with care. The head of the letter † is in some instances broken in the course of printing; but the shape and length of the remaining portion will sufficiently distinguish it from †.

The Index must be considered as the best authority for the correct orthography of the Linnæan names of plants. Even Mr. Colebrooke occasionally deviates from the writers at home.

The system of orthography for the spelling of Indian terms is very nearly that of Sir William Jones; the chief difference consisting in the substitution of h for c in expressing the sound of क and क्ष, and in omitting all accents except upon the long vowels; viz. á, í, ú, rí, and lí.

INTO THE NATURE OF LANGUAGE,

WITH A VIEW TO ASCERTAIN THE ORIGINAL MEANINGS OF THE SANSKRIT PREPOSITIONS

INTRODUCTION.

IN every inquiry which we make into the nature of language, we are bound to ascertain its relation to the other phenomena of nature, and to consider it as something more than a detached and subservient instrument of thought. When we examine language with care, it seems almost as mysterious as every thing else which surrounds us. We are apt to think that those things with which we are familiarised from childhood possess nothing either profound or perplexing. When, however, we inquire into the remote principles of language, we find that it shares in the mystery and obscurity in which all the phenomena of nature are involved.

When language began to be employed by man, he was not yet aware of the relation in which he stood to the rest of nature ; nor did he know that he was himself formed and directed by laws that rendered him subservient to the circumstances by which he was surrounded, and to which his own nature bore a close analogy. But when we investigate language, and rise from effects to causes, we are compelled to feel that man was merely a passive instrument, if not in its formation, at least in its improvement ; and we acquire the conviction that we must thoroughly comprehend the nature of this first offspring of the human mind, before we can hope to arrive at any legitimate conclusion as to the laws that regulate the phenomena of mind itself. But if language has its basis in the principles of nature, we must not forget that its perfection is the result of PROGRESSION, which is likewise the foundation of all improvement.

Man in the infancy of society, himself a mere infant in thought, was impelled by the pressure of his wants to the formation of a medium by which he might communicate with his own kind. The puppet of Nature, he was led by her to the formation of an instrument that has enabled him, by affixing names to his ideas, to turn general sentiments, which alone he could otherwise have felt, into individual thoughts. His mind being a sort of mirror that reflected every thing he felt and saw, he was driven by the principles implanted in his nature to the use of articulate sounds, with which as with colours he painted his own perceptions.

That language adapted itself in its infancy merely to represent the physical phenomena of nature will be evident by an analysis of its parts. All things material were designated by the NOUN, while the motions of these objects were indicated by the VERB in its simplest form: Such was the first step in language. The next was to invent words that should limit and define the points to which the motion implied by the verb tended, and thence resulted the PREPOSITION; and it will be found that every subject may be conveyed intelligibly, though with some tautology, by these three parts of speech, and they consequently constitute the foundation of language. To express the physical qualities of the noun, it was only necessary to join to it some other noun which possessed in a prominent degree the quality which it was wished to attribute to it. Thus to express the different colours, such as green, red, white, &c. the names for grass, rose, snow, &c. or some other objects with the same striking qualities, were employed, so also the name for a lion, a fox, an ass, &c. served to designate the qualities of courage, cunning, stupidity, &c.; and these became the first Adjectives.^{*} The Adverb was employed instead of a whole phrase to complete some accessory idea of the verb, such as the nature, manner, quality, or intensity of its motion or action. From this it is evident that the adjective defined the noun in the same way as the adverb did the verb. The junction of one thing with another was intimated by the Conjunction. The Pronouns for I and thou must have been of the earliest invention in language, as they represented the speaker and the person spoken to, perhaps even before either had a name. The Interjection was employed to rouse the attention of another, or to mark the excitement felt by the person employing it. The Article (derived from the demonstrative pronoun) was the last improvement of speech, and is only found in those languages which have advanced to their utmost perfection of form.

But if we are anxious to push our enquiries to the utmost limits of human investigation, we shall find a reason for the uniform and universal laws that govern the philosophy of language in every varied condition and peculiarity of the human race. It must be evident that speech was either conferred upon man at his creation, or arose imperceptibly as it was required by his wants. If the first, we must

It was owing to his having considered the abstract nature of qualities, that Adam Smith was led into the error of supposing that adjectives must have cost a great effort to the human mind in their invention. The nature of qualities is of very difficult conception; but their designation by an adjective, it will be seen, was very easy.

suppose it was once perfectly adapted to nature and to the social and intellectual relations in which he was to stand to his fellow man. But if it arose gradually, it was called into existence by the exigencies of his situation and the circumstances by which he was surrounded ; and in either case it must be considered as the reflex of his sensations and perceptions, and consequently will be in exact relation to the general laws of nature. It is on this account that the Noun and Verb had each its archetype in MATTER and MOTION ; and the Preposition that marked local relation, and the Termination or Auxiliary that denoted the tenses of the verb, had each its original in SPACE and TIME long anterior to the appearance of man on the earth. Language is thus forced to adapt itself to an abstract model that eludes all investigation. Space and Time being the mere concomitants of matter and motion, and having therefore a relative and not an absolute existence, language will be often found to notice them only by implication;* and this might be adduced as a further proof of the dependence of language on those remote principles of nature, which influence the mind of man without his being conscious of their agency.

It is owing to this plastic influence exerted over language and the imitative tendency of the mind, as well as the analogies to which it has recourse in all its deficiencies, that words which were originally participles or adjectives are employed permanently as nouns ; and that nouns themselves acquire the force and nature of verbs or prepositions, and are classed, unconsciously by the mind, with those parts of speech to which they have, by a new use, acquired an affinity. And in the same way that such new words become either nouns, verbs, &c. so did the first primitive sounds conform to that abstract model which existed before either words or man, and which language adapted itself to delineate, and has, as it were, reproduced or reflected with considerable accuracy and fidelity. Hence, whatever may be the etymological sense of Nouns, Verbs, and Prepositions, they must ultimately represent the various modifications of Matter and Motion, Time and Space : for language would be a mere jumble of sounds, barely sufficient to indicate the more pressing wants and sentiments of our nature, if it had not had some guiding principles to which it originally conformed.

In consequence of the connection existing between the elementary principles of nature, and to which language unconsciously conforms, every investigation respecting the Noun, Verb, and Preposition† must

* It may be seen that language often only notices them by implication ; for when we say he walked to town, both space and time are implied ; and when we say the bird flew over the field, though space is expressed by the preposition over, still the verb to fly implies both space and time ; for all motion must be through space and in time. But independently of the different tenses which specifically mark time, and the prepositions which designate the different relations of space, language necessarily comprehends one or other of these two categories in every primitive word ; e. g. a house must exist both in space and time.

† Though the Preposition only marks local relation, it can in no way be omitted in an investigation into be conducted with a due consideration of their mutual dependence. To consider any one of them without reference to the other two must lead to a partial, limited, and unsatisfactory result. These three parts of speech, therefore, being the mutual complements of one another, the truth can be alone elicited by considering them together. If it is conceded that Prepositions originally implied local relations, and the position seems hardly possible to be denied, Verbs must then be allowed to denote the different kinds of physical motion produced by the objects represented by Nouns. Hence there is an indissoluble connection existing between Nouns, Verbs, and Prepositions.

Such is the nature of the first or primitive state of language ; but it deposes this physical character as soon as it is employed to represent those abstract relations, which, in proportion to the extent and accuracy with which they are comprehended by any individual, raise him, in the scale of reason, almost as much above the rest of mankind, as man is elevated above the brute.

OF THE NOUN.

Nouns may be divided into two classes, that is to say into concrete and abstract.

Concrete Nouns are the names of such things as are perceived by the organs of sense, such as a house, a man, a tree, &c. As a further example, by the ear we perceive a sound, by the eye a colour, by the nose a scent, by the palate a taste, and by the skin or touch the air ; not one of which could we have discovered by any other organ than that which makes them respectively known to us. Concrete Nouns, therefore, are the names of things made known by the senses.

Abstract Nouns are the names of mental perceptions, whether they relate to *actions, acts, results, states, modes, relations, powers, qualities, numbers, degrees, sensations, or passions. Abstract Nouns, therefore, are the names of such things as are perceptible only to the mind. It will be evident that language to be definite, and therefore perfect, ought to have a precise and distinct termination for each class of abstract words. Such a provision would be of wonderful aid to abstract speculation, and the basis of language, as the motions of all things in nature have their limits, which are alone defined by this part of speech ; and it is as necessary to the Verb as those terminations or auxiliaries which mark time past, present, or future. It is on this account that it is almost invariably found compounded with it, as in Sanskrit, Greek, and Latin, or put immediately after it, as in English.

* Examples : The ACTION of striking, running, &c. produces the ACTS called a stroke, a run, &c. ; so the ACTION of bearing produces the RESULT called a birth. The STATE of sleeping results in sleep, and of dying in death. The term result is of indispensable use : for instance, a birth is not an act ; and the Sanskrit language has a particular form for this class of abstract ideas. Such words are usually formed by the termination ति ti, e. g. कृति kṛti, a make. See Sir Charles Wilkins' Grammar, Rule 830.

relieves the mind from much unnecessary labour, as it places the conceptions of the writer in the exact light in which they are intended by him. Any one who will take the trouble of analysing the variety of senses in which the word vision is employed in the English language, or still more particularly the word motion, will see that the sense in which these words may be employed by a writer or speaker, can alone be discovered by a painful application of thought. In the same way the French have only one word for conscience and consciousness, which must often be the cause of obscurity. The Sanskrit and Latin are both particularly rich in such distinct forms; but some confusion is occasionally observable in both these languages (though less in the former than in the latter) owing to the terminations having been improperly added by careless or illogical thinkers. For this, however, every allowance is necessary as mental perceptions do so closely approximate to one another, that it is frequently very difficult to discriminate to which class they properly belong; and indeed, in some instances, the same idea may be referred to more than one class, and some of the classes likewise would admit of subdivision.

A complete classification of the distinct perceptions of the mind is a great desideratum towards a perfect analysis of thought. Were a philosophic language ever to be invented this enquiry would be a preliminary step of indispensable necessity; as well as that of determining the distinct local relations for which prepositions ought to be used, and by limiting each to one definite sense, to prevent all chance of confusion and misconception.*

* A systematic classification, such as is here contemplated, would be of great value in forming the mind for metaphysical inquiries. An analysis of any process of reasoning, carried on with a reference to its distinctions, would afford the student a safe clue in many of the intricacies of thought in which he is often bewildered; and would give a clearness, and a consequent conviction of abstract truth, which the mind in vain seeks for when left to its own intuitive powers. Such an artificial aid would lead to the instant detection of sophistry in abstract speculations; for without a clear conception of the distinct differences of abstract words there can be no certainty in our conclusions. The employment of such a system of analysis would be an excellent conclusion to ordinary grammar, and might be termed abstract or transcendental grammar. Matters of feeling and opinion cannot from their nature admit of demonstration; but abstract questions, if the terms were properly defined, and the class of ideas to which they relate distinctly kept in view, ought to be as capable of proof as the things from which they are abstracted. Of the importance of always attending to the class of ideas to which any word belongs, every reasoning mind will be fully convinced by a little reflection. For instance, philosophers may be asked when they speak of the 'propagation of motion,' do they mean change of place or the something ponderable or imponderable that produces such an appearance? If the former, the word is clearly an abstract noun; but if the latter, it is a concrete noun, and refers to a different class of ideas, and must consequently give rise to perfectly different conclusions in any process of reasoning.

The noun of itself, without some verb being expressed or understood, cannot form a rational expression; it is on this account that, though the noun may seem the most obvious part of speech, yet still its precise meaning can be understood only by a reference to a verb; it being by means of this part of speech that all the operations of indicating, comparing, and reasoning are performed and determined. Hence there is an obvious necessity for bearing in mind the reciprocal influence of Noun and Verb, and also, as has been already shewn, of the Preposition, in every investigation into the nature of any one of these three fundamental parts of speech.

OF THE VERB.

THE following sketch of the verb in its different voices or states has been written in a concise way, to explain its real nature to the enquiring student.*

GENERAL OBSERVATIONS.

In the infancy of language the verb merely denoted the modes of motion peculiar to the simplest objects of nature, as to fly, to run, to strike, &c., but in process of time, as language became perfect, the verb adapted itself to the expression of every want of the human mind, and in this state it is considered as denoting action, being, or suffering. But it is solely by a metaphorical use that language is fitted for describing abstract ideas, and for this purpose the verb divests itself of its essential attribute, which is motion in a physical sense.

In all inquiries into language, the origin and formation of the verb has ever been deemed a subject of the highest interest. Either the first primitive language consisted simply of Substantives, which were insensibly moulded into Verbs and Prepositions, or the whole three sprang almost simultaneously into existence; but whether they are words originally and especially invented to mark motion, or have been adapted by degrees to this end, they at last acquire the same nature as if they had been specially formed for the purpose.

DEFINITIONS.

When any sort of motion is expressed to be going on independent of the will of the agent, as, the wood burns, the verb is termed neuter; but the neuter state is in the agent, and not in the verb, which only conforms to the state of the noun.

* These observations on Verbs and Prepositions are extracted from the Author's Bengalí Grammar.

If a verb denotes any particular kind of motion depending, or conceived to depend on the will of the agent, it is Active but intransitive; that is, it implies voluntary motion, which is commonly called Action, as, he runs, &c.; and when the motion passes on to an object on which it reposes, it is Active and Transitive, as, he strikes the child.

Again, where motion is communicated from one agent to another, the verb expressive of the motion is termed Causal; as he caused the horse to gallop; but the Cause exists in the first agent; the second is the Instrument; and the action of the verb remains unaltered in nature, but is marked in all languages by some modification in the sound of the word, as করিতে (karite) to make, করাইতে (karáite), to cause to make, in Bengálí; or, as in our own language, by compounding a verb implying agency with any infinitive expressive of the particular motion to be produced.

When an object is affected by any action in which it has no agency, and is put in the nominative case, the Verb expressive of the action is termed Passive; but the passion or suffering is in the object and not in the Verb; and in some languages this peculiar use of the Verb is simply marked by a modification of the Verb itself, as amo, I love, amor, I am loved, in Latin; and قَتَلَ (katala), he slew, and قُتِلَ (kutila), he was slain, in Arabic.

In our own, and in most derivative languages, the passive sense is conveyed by an attributive expressive of past time, i. e. by a passive participle, and the affirmation of the different tenses is expressed by an auxiliary verb.

The verb is termed Impersonal when it denotes any particular mode of motion resulting from the spontaneous operations of nature, as it rains; or from the fitness of things, as it behoves me to go. Hence Nature and Necessity are the real nominatives to such verb-.

It thus appears that the Verb, whether we term it Neuter, Intransitive, Transitive, Causal, Passive, or Impersonal, was equally simple in its origin; and that it is essentially the same in whatever voice it is used. The particular action, state, or passion it is supposed to imply, exists only in the agent or object, and not in itself. Still in almost all languages the sound of the verb is found modified to mark the voice in which it is used, though it is occasionally to be met with unaltered in sound, whether employed in a transitive, intransitive, or neuter sense. Our own words to bear, to burn, to feel, &c. shew that this may be done without any misconception.

From the foregoing remarks on the nature of the verb, it results, that Motion is its essential attribute; and that those who hold it to be a mere connective, have not, perhaps, sufficiently considered its origin; and have been led to observe its apparent use, which is often metaphorical, rather than its essential quality, which indicates different kinds of motion. But even when it is considered as a mere connective, it would be more correct to call it an affirmative.

It would seem that the real cause why the nature of the verb has been so much controverted, has simply arisen from the very partial and unconnected view which has been taken of it in every research into language. It is only by considering it with reference to the Noun and the Preposition, which are its natural complements, that we can arrive at any just ideas upon the subject. But viewed in connection with these, its real nature becomes obvious. (See the remarks on the Prepositions.)

After use had fixed the first forms of the verb, the rest were easily brought into existence by that love of analogy which is inseparably connected with the nature of the human mind. In our own language we can by convention form any number of verbs from nouns or adjectives. Thus we have made to shoe, to salt, to better, to blacken, &c., a peculiarity that tends to a singular conciseness and precision of expression.

These remarks on the Verb have been hazarded under the hope of putting the matter in a clear and consistent light to the learner; for the Verb is the very life of language; the Noun is what it describes, and the Preposition, when requisite, defines the direction of its motion or action. Hence these three are the basis of all language, and must be employed or understood in almost every proposition; but the other parts of speech may be either expressed by a circumlocution, or even altogether rejected.

OF VOICES

As it often becomes a matter of difficulty to ascertain the exact Voice to which a verb belongs, the following remarks, in addition to what has been just said, are added, with a view of putting the subject in a clear light.*

It is to be remarked, that in Sanskrit the fourth conjugation contains the great body of the neuter verbs, while at the same time it is that which in its middle voice is identical, in form, with the passive. The object is now to shew, that whatever purpose is effected by the letter ऋ ya, which is the distinctive sign of the passive voice, is equally accomplished by the same letter for the fourth conjugation. In all languages there is an affinity between passive and neuter verbs, and there are some verbs that might be almost indifferently classed under the passive or neuter voice: such instances frequently occur in MANU, the elucidation of which has led me to treat the subject at length.

The verb जयते jáyaté, he is born, is classed by the Sanskrit grammarians in the fourth conjugation, though, had they ranged it with the passive verbs, it would not have been changed in the slightest degree in form. That they have not done so shews the correctness of their notions of grammar. Dr. Johnson, in his Dictionary of the English Language, states that the verb to be born is neuter-passive. The verb is originally passive, for when all its parts are supplied, it means to be borne by a mother; but in its popular and elliptical use, being employed without any reference to its agent, as when we say, he was born last year, it becomes truly a neuter verb, for it then merely affirms the first appearance of a child in the world. The verb nascor, in Latin, may be contested as belonging to the passive by its form, and to the neuter by its use; for it answers the conditions of a deponent verb, which requires a passive form without a passive signification. The French derivative of nascor, i. e. naître, is laid down to be neuter in the dictionary of the French Academy. In Hindústání the passive and some other verbs are conjugated with جانا jáná, to go, and none but neuter ones with ہوا honá, to be; and in that language to be born is پیدا ہوا paidá honá, and therefore neuter. Thus we see that we have the analogy of language for considering to be born as neuter by its use, whatever may be the conclusion we come to by a reference to its derivation.

Perhaps the following reason for the solution of the equivocal nature of some neuter verbs may be of service as affording a clue for determining their classification, and to shew why there is that similarity between the fourth conjugation and the passive voice in Sanskrit; and between all neuter and passive verbs.

The Subject both in the passive and neuter voice has no will or choice in the action implied by the verb: thus, in the sentence he dies, the subject is affected by a STATE over which he has no control and which he would resist if he could; and in that of he is killed, he suffers from an ACTION he cannot avoid. In both these instances the subject is exposed to but one result, independent of his will; the having or not having which, constitutes the real distinction in all animal sufferings and actions. It is on this account, I conceive, that there is such a similarity between the fourth conjugation and the passive voice, for whether the subject of the verb be exposed to a state, or to an action, which he cannot avoid, he must be the object. If a conjecture might be offered as to the sense of the increment य ya, which is the distinctive sign of both the passive and the fourth conjugation, I would say, that it is connected with या yá or ई i, go, and that it fills the same office in Sanskrit which is done by the derivative jáná, to go, in Hindústání and the other dialects.

To define the difference in doubtful cases between a neuter and a passive verb, we have therefore only to consider whether the subject suffers from a state or an action; that is, whether there is the agency of natural causes, or of an individual, in producing the effect implied by the verb.

But if it be necessary, on the one hand, to distinguish accurately between the passive and the neuter, it is equally important to discriminate between the neuter and the intransitive verb, in nice and doubtful cases; for the neuter verb holds an intermediate place between the passive and the intransitive; and here again the same test will give us the true definition; namely, if the action implied by the verb depends upon its subject, we may be certain it is not neuter, and that the verb is consequently either transitive or intransitive. Had a rule of this kind, which would afford a logical arrangement, been kept in view, we should not have our grammarians differing about the nature of neuter verbs. That they have been much perplexed by making distinctions upon imperfect grounds of judgment, may be seen by referring to Mr. Lindley Murray's English Grammar, on the Verb. The presence or absence of volition in the nominative can alone enable us to determine the nature of the verb, and consequently by that test are we to be guided whether the nominative is the agent or the object. Upon this view of the matter I have arranged the different verbs as follows: and have given examples, lest any doubt should arise as to their classification.

VOLUNTARY.

The Nominative THE AGENT.	{	Intransitive,	as He runs, stands, sits.
		Transitive,	— He kills, strikes, &c.
	{	Reflective,	— He kills, &c. (himself).
		Causal,	— He causes to kill, strike, &c.

INVOLUNTARY.

The Nominative THE OBJECT.	{	Impersonal,	as It rains, thunders, snows, &c.
		Neuter,	— He dies, sleeps, drowns, &c.
	{	Passive,	— He is killed, struck, &c.
		Causal Passive,	— He is caused to be killed, &c.

OF PREPOSITIONS.

THE various local relations of objects are denoted by Prepositions; but though all languages do not in every case make use of the same relations, yet there are some primary ones that are common to all, as up, down; in, out, &c. As those persons who have not analysed language may find it difficult to attach a definite idea to the words local relation, it may be rendered more intelligible by saying, it is that idea which results from the mind contrasting together two things with reference to their mutual position: thus the sky is above the earth; above therefore implies the relation between sky and earth; but by altering our point of view we may say, the earth is beneath the sky; beneath therefore implies the relation between earth and sky. It is therefore evident that they were the first abstract words possessed by language.

The Noun is the name of a thing; the Verb describes its mode of motion or action; and the Preposition defines the direction of that motion; that is, whether it is to, from, by, against, under, over, &c. any given object. Hence its primary sense is that of LOCAL RELATION.

Thus Prepositions were originally employed to define the relative situations of the different objects of nature, which were of course, in the infancy of society, the first things that required the employment of speech. But in proportion as the impressions received through the senses began to be compared and comprehended, the operations of the intellect were developed, and almost imperceptibly, a new application of language was required to express the various relations of abstract ideas. And though there may seem to be no necessary connection between abstract notions and the relations of material things; yet, as the comprehension of the former gradually arises out of the consideration of the modes of material existence, so this first and simple language, which had resulted from the necessity of describing whatever came within the scope of the senses, was at last employed to denote the abstract conceptions of the mind; because it afforded a natural analogy, and saved the trouble of a new, and perhaps impossible, convention. Hence it must be purely metaphorical, as often as it is employed in the description of mental perceptions.

The obvious distinction between language which had been invented to describe natural objects, and its figurative application to denote abstract ideas, must never be lost sight of in practice. For, when Prepositions are employed for the purposes for which they were invented, they mark the relations of local position; as, “The bird flew to, above, before, behind, &c. the tree.” But when the same Prepositions are borrowed by a figurative use to express abstract conceptions; as, “Fancy triumphs over reason,” or “The mind revolts against oppression,” they imply nothing more than a mere mental contrast; and by convention we agree to think that what we assimilate in our minds to above and before, &c. is better than what we designate by below and behind, &c. though there can be neither up nor down, before nor after, in what is purely mental.

From what has been remarked above, it will be evident that Prepositions were, in the origin of language, almost as indispensable as verbs; for without their aid few verbs could convey a definite idea, as the Prepositions alone denote the direction of the action of the verb. Perhaps they had been more properly termed directives, definitives, or limitatives than Prepositions. (See the Remarks on the Verb.)

In the foregoing concise view of the nature of Prepositions, it is not pretended to give a decided opinion how they have come into their present form and use in the Sanskrit language, but merely to say that the closest and most impartial consideration bestowed on the subject confirms the belief already expressed, that as they are the natural complement of the noun and verb, whether they are primitive words or are employed in a figurative sense, they at last express but one distinct relation, which is in its primary use a local one, and implies either up or down, in or out, &c. A reference to some words employed in the Bengálí, Hindústání, and other dialects springing from the Sanskrit, is of great value in elucidating the manner in which such words are divested of their original nature, and restricted to a given use. The word সমীপে samípa originally meant, as is clear by its etymology, *in the vicinity of water, but it is now used for in the vicinity or near generally. So the Bengálí participle होते hoite, being, as a preposition implies from. In Hindústání پاس pás, near, is a corruption of the Sanskrit form पार्श्वे párswe, in the side; and میں men, in, seems to be derived from the Sanskrit मध्ये madhye, in the middle. These instances, which we can still trace to the original language, are sufficient to shew how words totally different in their nature may come at last to imply but one relation; and to this state they are brought by the very nature of the human mind, and those external causes that control and force language into such special classes, as Noun, Verb, and Preposition. The strongest reason that could be assigned for the primitive nature of Sanskrit Prepositions is the fact of their being often the shortest words in the language, and being incapable of decomposition or analysis except in the instance of the word परा. It ought not likewise to be forgotten that the inseparable Prepositions, being compounded with verbs and nouns, have been preserved by this union from the corruptions and changes which would have affected them in a separate state; and this may be one reason why there is less difference between the Prepositions in Greek, Latin, and Sanskrit (when they are the words of the same stock) than between the other words that are found to co-exist in these three cognate languages.

Prepositions are a very important part of speech; and particularly in so pure a language as the Sanskrit. A little attention to the etymology of the language may finally save the learner much time and trouble; as well as give him a more perfect knowledge of its structure than he could acquire from merely learning the words by rote. And in those instances where the words cannot be resolved by any general rules of etymology, we must bear in mind that many must be founded upon allusions which are lost in the remoteness of antiquity. It should not be forgotten, likewise, that terms of more modern formation are generally less pure than the more ancient ones, owing to the compounds being formed without a reference to the distinction between the physical and the figurative senses of the elementary words. It is owing to this defect, which comes on with the growth of language, that Greek words compounded with a preposition admit of such unsatisfactory analysis. Indeed though the Greek language has retained many of the peculiarities of the Sanskrit, particularly in the forms of the verbs, yet in its words it is so much corrupted, that we might be inclined to believe that it was introduced amongst a people whose organs of utterance were as unfitted for correctly imitating the original sounds, as those of our Saxon ancestors were for pronouncing the Norman French*. Still, it is possible, that much of this apparent corruption arose from the circumstance that the Greeks, like many of the modern nations, adopted an alphabet unfitted to express the sounds peculiar to their language.

* It probably is owing to this, and to the adoption of the Phœnician alphabet, that there is so much that is anomalous in the Greek language. The languages that are written with alphabets derived from the Phœnician class do, with the exception of the Greek and Latin, omit the vowels, while those of Hindu

In conclusion it remains only to say that in the foregoing view of the Noun, the Verb, and the Preposition, the truth has been elicited by a reference to their mutual dependence on one another; and whoever considers the subject in the same connected point of view must come to the same result. As a general rule, whenever any verb implies a physical motion, such as to fly, to run, to leap, &c. the preposition employed will be found to express a local relation, as to fly up, to fly down, &c., and that such simple senses of the prepositions must be their primary significations is as clear as that the figurative meanings are those that are borrowed from them. To find, therefore, as a general rule, the original sense of a Preposition or Verb, we have only to consider whether it is employed in a physical or a figurative sense.

OF INSEPARABLE PREPOSITIONS

In assigning the meanings of the following Prepositions, the primary, that is the local relation which they convey is printed in capitals; while those senses which arise from the primary idea by implication, or by a figurative use, are printed in italics. But it must not be thence concluded that they have really so many various significations. The multitude of nicely discriminative Prepositions in our own language, is the cause why we almost invariably reserve each of them to define but one relation of things; though in figurative language what denotes before would equally well imply first, or against, and so on for the others. But even among our own Prepositions, though we could (as far as regards meaning) most accurately substitute other particles that should convey every signification of by, as well as its primary sense of NEAR, yet custom has determined that we must use it, instead origin almost invariably express them. The Greeks, in adapting the Phœnician alphabet to the wants of their own language, were obliged to form vowels out of consonants. Would not this fact lead to a suspicion that they had already been accustomed to an alphabet in which the vowels were always written; and is not this idea confirmed by bearing in mind that, unlike the Phœnician which is written from right to left, they oscillated between the two modes, and after using the Boustrophedon finally recurred to the same plan as the nations from which they derived their origin and language, and wrote from left to right, in addition to making use of vowels? The question of the digamma, which is involved in so much obscurity and has given rise to so much controversy, has entirely arisen out of the adaptation of the Phœnician alphabet to a language for which, by the nature of its construction, it was singularly unfitted. The principle on which the Phœnician alphabet has been formed is one main cause why the Hebrew, Arabic, and other kindred dialects for which it was originally invented, have been preserved in such purity to the present time. But it must be remembered that it was framed expressly for this particular class of languages.

of any other, in very many instances ; and this word affords a good example of the way in which the following primary and figurative meanings of the Prepositions are to be understood.

If the figurative meaning assigned to one Preposition may seem occasionally to encroach upon that laid down for another, it should be remembered, that a word must necessarily, when metaphorically employed, be often equally capable of conveying the same idea as one whose primary signification is very different ; for this reason the idea of excellence or superiority may be equally well denoted, in figurative language, by the word before, as by above, or beyond.

The Prepositions cannot be added at pleasure to a root or word ; but their use must be determined by the custom of the language. Two or three are very often prefixed to one root, and, though rarely, even four may be found added, as in the word समन्निवर्गश्च surrounded, attended upon, in which there are सं, अभि, वि, and आ prefixed to the root ह take. Except when such words have been formed by poetical license, we must suppose that these Prepositions have been added successively to modify the meaning of the first word. Thus we must suppose that ह was modified by the addition of आ, and that आह was again modified by the addition of वि, and वाह by अभि, &c. ; and though these intermediate forms may no longer be found, it is no proof that they did not once exist in some state or other of compound verb or verbal derivative.

It may still be objected that there is a large body of nouns, regularly formed by the union of prepositions with roots, that seem quite absolute in the meanings assigned to them, and for the use of which convention can alone be pleaded ; and that therefore any reference to the original meaning of the prepositions and roots can be of no utility. To this it may be replied, that undoubtedly at first sight such words as आहार áhára, food, वाहति vyáhríti, a sacred sentence, &c. though compounded from the prepositions आ á and वि vi and the root ह hri, to take, to seize, &c. can hardly be forced into the sense assigned to the increments of which they are formed. If, however, we reflect a little on the subject, we shall see that they have not acquired these senses in an arbitrary way, but conformably to certain principles which an attentive enquiry into the language cannot fail to discover. Thus the verb आह áhri, in strict accordance to the signification of its component elements, means “ To take (any thing) to (one’s self) ;” hence the substantive आहार áhára denotes, “ That which is taken to himself by any one,” i. e. food, nourishment. The verb वाह vyáhri signifies “ To utter, to express, to speak ;” whence the substantive वाहति vyáhríti * means

* It is not without interest to see how these forms arise in language : आहार áhára appears to be a modification of the imperative singular, employed in the same way as we do the Latin recipe for a noun : वाहति vyáhríti, and such forms, are evidently modifications of the perfect participle. So in Latin this part of speech seems to have given rise to such nouns as erectus, carriage, conveyance ; questus, complaint, &c.

“ Whatever is uttered or spoken,” i. e. A sentence. The close connection of nouns such as these with the verbal roots of the language, has not escaped the observation of the native Hindu grammarians and commentators, who frequently state at once the etymology and the meaning of a substantive, by merely assigning the verb, whether simple or compound, which has given origin to it. The two words just alluded to would, according to the method of the Pandits, be thus explained : आह्रियते इति आहारः, ब्राह्मियते इति ब्राह्मतिः. In the same way in English an oversight implies the thing which is overseen, provision is the thing which is provided, &c. It must be clear that this is one of the inevitable expedients to which the human mind has recourse to abridge useless prolixity of discourse, and at the same time to preserve those analogies which are the only guides that can secure the certainty of not being misunderstood. It is unnecessary to extend these examples further, as the sagacity of the learner will soon lead him to trace out the origin of such words from the instances here brought to his mind.

Mr. Wilson, the learned Professor of Sanskrit in the University of Oxford, in the Preface to the second edition of his valuable Sanskrit Dictionary, remarks upon the vague and arbitrary manner in which he conceives the Sanskrit prepositions are used in composition with the roots ; but as it appears to me that there is a perfect analogy in the manner in which they are employed, I have ventured to quote his observations, and to analyze his examples according to the views about to be explained.

“ It is also difficult,” says Professor Wilson, “ if not impossible, to provide in one language an equivalent for every shade of meaning which the terms of another may be made to convey, especially in a language like the Sanscrit, in which compound verbs and their derivatives are often used in a vague and arbitrary manner, or even when they may be thought to offer some connexion with their original import, do so in a remote and indeterminate degree. It would be easy to multiply instances of this nature, but the following will be sufficient at present.

“ The verb शि ‘to serve’ when combined with the prefix आङ् most commonly means ‘to have recourse to for asylum or support.’ This idea, although it may be considered as the basis of the various applications made of the derivatives of the verb, is not always very evident in such phrases as these : (1) स्वबलमाश्रितः Confiding in the strength of his own arm ; (2) बातायनाश्रिता Standing at a window ; (3) आसनमाश्रितः Seated on a seat ; (4) मयूरपृष्ठाश्रिणा उहेन By ŚKANDA riding on the back of a peacock ; (5) वीर्यमुपाश्रित Displaying valour, (6) काममाश्रित Affected by desire ; (7) ऊर्जाश्रयं वचनं High-spirited speech ; (8) संस्कृतमाश्रित Speaking Sanscrit ; (9) प्रकृताश्रयः प्रत्ययाश्रयो वा निषेधः A prohibition regarding either a crude noun or an affix, &c. Now here, neither sitting, nor standing, nor riding, nor speaking can in any way be regarded as the proper interpretations of आशि and its derivatives, and it might convey an erroneous idea of their real purport so to render them in a dictionary, although they may be legitimately expressed in translations by similar equivalents.” Preface, p. ix.

The compound verb आशि ásri, properly, must be limited to signify “ to resort or have recourse to (a person or thing for any purpose, e. g. for asylum, support, &c.).” The sense of the noun आश्रय ásraya may thence be easily deduced by the Hindu method above alluded to : आश्रियते इति आश्रयः “ Whatever is resorted to (for any purpose) is आश्रय ásraya, a resource.” To this primary meaning of आशि may be traced back all the different senses which its derivatives admit or demand in the combinations enumerated by Professor Wilson. The first phrase may be literally rendered, “ Having recourse to the strength of his arm ;” the second, “ Having recourse (or resorting) to a window ;” the third, “ Having recourse to (availing himself of) a seat ;” the fourth, “ By SKANDA resorting to (availing himself of) the back of a peacock ;” the fifth (appears to be inserted by mistake, but the additional preposition उप upa does not seem to affect the sense in any great degree) “ Having recourse to valour ;” the sixth, “ Having recourse to love (i. e. yielding to the power of love) ;” the seventh, “ Speech which has recourse to vigour or energy ;” the eighth, “ Resorting to (using, employing) the Sanskrit language ;” and the ninth, “ A prohibitive rule which resorts or applies to either a crude noun or a suffix.”

GENERAL RULE

WHEN a Preposition is prefixed to a verb or participle it has then the force of an ADVERB. But when it is prefixed to an original noun it then assumes the nature of an ADJECTIVE.

A want of attention to this simple distinction is the cause why such compounds appear to be so capacious and uncertain in their significations.

आ á. 10, vi. figur. *perfect, complete.

This Preposition denotes the relation subsisting between two things which both extend to the same point, hence it defines the limit of the action of any verb ; as he went to the house : i. e. up to the house. If prefixed to a root implying going, it makes it to mean coming, and if to a root signifying giving, it makes it imply taking, because the root only expresses some kind of motion generally ; thus what goes to any one, comes to him ; and again what is given to any one, is implied to be taken. Its use as a prefix to all words but verbs, may seem rather obscure, except we remember that junction with what we desire implies completeness and perfection ; thus आभा ábhá, splendor, from भा bhá, shine. This Preposition will be found to be as nearly as possible the reverse of अप apa. It is identified with the Greek α , and the Latin ad, in which the d is pleonastic, as in prodesse and proleo, without the same necessity for its insertion, as in these two examples, where its use is to prevent any hiatus in sound. In original Sanskrit grammars it is written आ°.

* Agreeably to what has just been said, the primary LOCAL RELATION expressed by any Preposition is printed in capitals, and the figurative senses are given in italics.

अप apa, OFF, OR AWAY: figur. inferior, bad.

This Preposition may be considered as the reverse of आ á, as it marks the relation subsisting between objects which are off or away from one another; hence it denotes disjunction. Prefixed to a verb of motion it makes it imply separation; as अपगत apagata, gone away, or off; and added to any other kind of root or word, it deteriorates, or reverses the sense; because disjunction implies imperfection; as अपकृत apakṛta, hindered, from कृ kṛi, do; अपचय apachaya, loss, from चि chi, accumulate. It is identified in origin with the Greek $\alpha\pi\delta$, the Latin ab, and the English off.

प्र pra. FORE, OR BEFORE: figur. prior, exceeding, excellent, very.

Prefixed to a verb of motion, it will of course seem to imply progressive motion, as forth, forward, &c.; but the Preposition merely marks the direction of the motion implied by the verb. As that which precedes, exceeds, and is generally conceived to be better than that which follows; and as that which is before, is beyond the thing it is in contrast with, this Preposition serves to mark priority, excess, excellence, and intensity.

It is identified in origin with the Greek $\pi\rho$, the Latin pro and præ; but pro seems generally to express the primary idea, and præ the figurative senses. And, finally, it is the same as the English for or fore.

परा pará. OPPOSITE: figur. over, across, contrary, reverse.

The relation intended by this Preposition expresses the situation of anything which is opposite to something else; as the further bank of a river,* &c.; hence it implies, 1. The position of any thing

* This is the only preposition which admits of analysis; it is therefore of singular value in throwing light upon the history of these primitive words. The preposition परा pará implies the relation that exists between two lines that are exactly opposite and therefore parallel ($\pi\alpha\rho' \acute{\alpha}\lambda\lambda\eta\lambda\omicron\iota\nu$) and equal to one another. In Sanskrit the near shore of a river is termed वार vara, but the opposite shore is called पार pára, almost the very word we are considering; the word पर para too means other, beyond, and has given birth to the Greek $\pi\epsilon\rho\epsilon$. In Latin we have par, adj. equal, even, corresponding, and from thence par, a pair, a match, an equal, and from this has sprung the French pair, the English pair and peer: all these senses arise out of the idea of two things exactly opposite and therefore equal to one another, and this Preposition, whether employed in Sanskrit or Greek, is so true to its origin, that it always implies a reference to two things, one of which is meant to be opposite and equal to the other: so a paradox, $\pi\alpha\rho\acute{\alpha}\delta\omicron\varsigma$, opposite or over the way; so पराक्रम parákrama (over-step):* any great exertion; as strength, prowess, valour, &c. and पराग parága (over-going): an eclipse; dust, &c. 2. Contrariety; as पराक् paráh (going across): crooked, crookedly. 3. What is reverse; as पराङ्मुख paránmukha (face-reversed): having the face averted; and पराभूत parábhúta (become reversed); overcome. It might equally well denote what is parallel, or equal to; but it is very little used, and almost every instance of its occurrence has been exhausted in the foregoing examples. It seems exactly to correspond to, and to have a common origin with the Greek παρά and the Latin par.

अधि adhi. OVER: figur. superior (in station, quantity, quality, or degree).

It marks the relative position of something over, or above, another; and hence denotes that the action of the verb passed over, or above some given object; as अधीत adhíta (gone over), i. e. perused. Prefixed to nouns, it denotes their superiority in station, quantity, quality, or degree, according to their meaning.

नि ni. IN, OR WITHIN, ON, UPON: figur. entire, perfect, complete, ceasing, refraining.

This Preposition marks the relation between two things, one of which is contained by the other; as निचित nichita (collected in): full, complete, from चि chi, accumulate. The idea of wholeness, perfection, and completeness naturally arises in considering any object as having all its parts within itself. As what remains in, is implied to be in a state of cessation or refraining, this Preposition is occasionally employed to express both these states; so निवृत्त nivritta (turned in): ceased, from वृत् vrit, turn; and निवर्त्ता nivartá (refraining from a choice): a virgin, from वृ vri, choose; because anciently females had the right of choosing a husband, who is hence called वर्त्ता vara, which properly signifies a choice. It is sometimes apparently confounded with निर् nir. In origin and meaning it is the same as the Greek ἐν, and the Latin and English in.

निर् nir. OUT, OR WITHOUT: figur. void, or destitute of. निः nih, निश् nis, निष् nish, निस् nis, are forms of which it is susceptible, according to the nature of the first letter of the word to which it is joined.

The relation existing between two things of which one is outside of the other, is denoted by this Preposition; hence it serves, without any ambiguity, to mark destitution, or privation; as निर्वाकृति nirákríti (without a form): formless. But even its most literal meaning will convey, under another point of view, an opposite sense; as निर्वचन nirvachana, speaking out, an explaining or narrating, is an opinion contrary to the usual one. The opposite bank of a river, called pára, therefore naturally suggested the relation intended to be conveyed by the Sanskrit परा pará, and the Greek παρά.

* The meaning put between parentheses is that which I derive from the word by Etymology, but those which immediately follow it are taken from the Dictionaries of the language.

&c.* It agrees exactly in sense, but not in origin, with the Greek ἐξ, the Latin ex, and the English out.

সং sam. WITH, OR BESIDE: figur. complete, perfect.

সং sang, সঙ্ san, সন্ san, সন্ san, সম্ sam, are forms which it will be found occasionally to assume, according to the letter with which the word to which it is prefixed commences.

This Preposition denotes the relation existing between things which are beside one another; hence it conveys the idea of accompaniment, completeness, and perfection. The Greek σὺν, and the Latin cum, con, seem perfectly identified with it in origin and signification.

অভি abhi. BEFORE: figur. first, better, against.

The relation existing between objects, of which one is before or in front of the other, is expressed by this preposition; as অভিমুখ abhimukha (before the face): present. As what is before may be considered as first and better than other things with which it has a relation, this Preposition is sometimes employed for that purpose; as অভিজাত abhijata (first, or better-born): noble. It seems to be of the same origin as the Latin ob. The difference between it and প্র pra, may be, that the latter expresses something before, without relation to distance; while অভি abhi conveys the idea of what is immediately before, or in front.

When of two things one is after the other, the relation existing between them is expressed by this Preposition; as অনুগ anuga (going after): following. So what is done after any thing else, implies imitation; thus অনুকর anukara (a doing after): imitation, resemblance. It further serves to mark regular succession, as অনুক্রম anukrama (step after step). order, due succession, arrangement.

উৎ ut, or উদ্ ud. UP: figur. high, elevated, superior

This Preposition agrees exactly with our up, and marks the relative position of any thing that is up or above something else: hence its figurative senses. It corresponds in sense to the Greek αὐα.

অব ava. DOWN: figur. low, contemptible, bad.

It is the reverse of the preceding Preposition, and marks the relation between things one of which is below the other, and added to a verb implies that its action had a downward tendency; as অবতাব avatara, (passing down) descent, incarnation, from ত্রী trí, pass; and অবগত avagata, (gone down through, as a passage in a book,) i. e. comprehended, or understood, in which latter word an analogous metaphor will be observed to prevail. It deteriorates or reverses the sense of nouns to which it is prefixed, by the same figurative use as অপা apa, because what is beneath another is considered inferior when used in a figurative sense; thus অবরস avarasa, a bad taste, from রস rasa, a taste, and অবরূঢ় avarúdhā, dismounted, from রূহ ruh, mount. It corresponds in sense but not in origin to the Greek κατά.

* Here we have an instance of the General Rule already laid down that the nature of the word to which the preposition is added reacts on the preposition and modifies its meaning: in this instance, being added to the verbal noun the sense is reversed: this is one cause of the obscurity in which this branch of grammar has been so long involved.

উপ upa. NEAR, OR BY: similar, inferior, subordinate.

When two things are near each other, their relative position is marked by উপ upa; as উপগতা upagata, (gone near); approached, from গতা gata, gone. What is near another in kind, is similar but inferior; therefore উপনাম upanāma, (near or almost a name): a by-name, a nick-name. উপধর্ম upadharma, (similar to a law, a subordinate law): a by-law. There seems to be a perfect resemblance between this Preposition, in signification and origin, with the Greek ὑπὲρ and the Latin sub, though in the latter language the figurative has usurped the place of the primitive sense.

বি vi. APART: figur. peculiar, distinct, different, without.

This Preposition denotes the relation in the state of a thing that is apart, or separate from another; thus বিক্ষিপ্ত vikshipta, (thrown apart): scattered. Hence it figuratively implies peculiarity, or distinctness. It expresses the same idea as in common to our own and other languages, when we say any thing has a “peculiar form,” by which we mean that it has a form apart, or distinct from something else, and which may be either good or bad by convention, but more commonly the latter. Thus বিরূপ virúpa (peculiar form): deformed, monstrous. As the idea of privation naturally arises from that which expresses separation, this Preposition is frequently so employed; as বিফল viphala (without fruit): fruitless; and in this sense it is identified with the Persian بی bí. It seems to agree in sense and origin with the Latin de and di, which are perhaps corrupt forms of ve, as found in vecors and vesanus; but it is perfectly preserved in the Latin vidua, which is identical with the word বিধবা vidhará, (vi without, dhava, a husband): whence also the Saxon wiþa, from which comes the English widow.

পরি pari. AROUND: figur. entirely, thoroughly.

This Preposition denotes the relation between things one of which is around something else; as পরিবিক্ষিপ্ত parikshipta (thrown around): surrounded, entrenched. Hence it figuratively conveys the idea of any thing entirely done; because what is done all around implies completeness, or finish; as পরিপূর্ণ paripūrṇa, entirely, or quite full. It seems to agree in every respect with the Greek περ and the Latin per.

প্রতি prati. AGAIN, BACK AGAIN, OVER AGAIN, AGAINST: figur. resistance, repetition, reflection, much.

It denotes the relation existing between things which by repetition return again in a sort of order. This idea is suggested by the winding back and forward of a rivulet,* or of a path, the coil of a rope, &c. Hence it marks, 1. Resistance; as প্রতিক্ষিপ্ত pratikshipta (flung back again): rejected, repelled, resisted. 2. Repetition; as প্রতিক্ಷেপ্ত pratikrishta (ploughed again): twice ploughed. 3. Return; as প্রত্যুত্তর pratyuttara (answering back again): reply. 4. Reflection; as প্রতিচ্ছায়া praticcháyá (shadow back again): a reflection, image, or picture. And from this repetition arises the idea of intensity; as 5. প্রতিশিষ্ট pratisrishta (distinguished again and again): renowned. It is the exact equivalent of the Latin re.

অতি ati. BEYOND: figur. excessive, great, very.

The relation subsisting between objects, one of which is beyond the other, is signified by this Preposition; as অতিনৌ atinau, beyond the boat, অতিপাতন atipatana (going beyond): transgression. Hence it conveys the idea of excess, as অতিদান atidána, excessive liberality; and অতিবৃদ্ধি atiriddhi, great increase, অতিদূর atidúra, very distant. It expresses exactly the same relation as the Latin trans, and the Greek μετά.

অপি api. UPON.

This Preposition, which is so common in Greek, is so rarely employed, that it might have been omitted without inconvenience. It seems to denote the relation of any object that is upon another, as অপিনদ্ধ apinaddha (bound upon): accounted. As a conjunction its use is very common, implying moreover, also, likewise, which seems to corroborate the sense here assigned to it. It is of the same origin as the Greek ἐπὶ.

* Mankind in the infancy of language must have found the idea of repetition extremely difficult, and if we bear in mind that the English words two-fold, three-fold; the Latin duplex, triplex, and the Sanskrit dwiguna, triguna (two twists, three twists), all convey ideas borrowed from some material objects, we shall be convinced that it is to such things that the speaker must have had recourse to suggest this idea to another. A folding screen or a fan conveys the idea exactly of a thing which is repeated in exact order; but in the infancy of society a winding stream, the folds of the skin, or the coil of a rope, would present the most obvious images.

† It must strike the scholar that the meaning of GOOD assigned to this Preposition, and that of BAD to the next, is contrary to the principle laid down that every preposition implied local relation: this objection is so obvious that it requires explanation. The prepositions, according to the nature of the word with which they were compounded, acted either as adverbs or adjectives, and were consequently the earliest words of that kind possessed by language. The first adjectives required would be good and bad, and the question immediately occurs which of the prepositions would best imply these two ideas. Independently of the general reasoning that might lead us to a just conclusion, we have the aid afforded by analogy.

This Preposition is only employed to enhance the value of nouns and adjectives ; hence it conveys, according to the nature of the word to which it is prefixed, the idea of 1. Perfection, or goodness :

In Latin propè means near, and from it arises the adjective proprius, and thence comes likewise the French propre and the English proper, meaning good, fit, &c. From proprius likewise descends proprietas, property. In Sanskrit too the preposition सू su seems to have entered into the adjective स्वम् su + as, own, and the noun स्वम् su + am, property, hence we see why we have the Latin suus (su + us) his own, implying also proper, due, lawful. Now if we were to ask how land would be apportioned out among a population beginning to feel its value, certainly the law would be that each man should take that which was nearest to him, and thence vicinage would be held to confer the highest right in the division of the yet unappropriated earth. As an illustration, let us suppose for a moment men thrown upon an uninhabited island : as long as the hope of escape remained, if they had families, they would simply confine themselves to the preparation of some means of shelter from the weather ; but as soon as the conviction arose that they must pass their lives where they were, an allotment of the land would take place, and each would claim that which was nearest to his own dwelling, and which on that account would be considered as his own property. The connection of this word with the idea of nearness is thus established, as well as with that of property. Its original signification therefore seems to be close, and the difference between it and उप upa is that the latter means proximity in a general sense, while सू su implies close contact ; an idea supported by the English verb to meet, which gives rise to the adjectives meet, proper, right, good, &c. ; and to be fitting, that is, to be right, proper, good, &c. and which springs from the idea of things that fit together. The sense of good springs naturally from the idea of what belongs to ourselves in relation to the individual, the family, or the nation ; thus our own opinions, our own family descent and customs, our own national qualities, we must from our very nature consider as better than those of others ; and so true is language to this leading idea, that we call our property our goods (in French nos biens). This subject may be further illustrated by a reference to the Persian : M. Burnouf's researches have demonstrated that the Sanskrit स्वदत्तम् swa-dattas, self-given, self-manifested, (Latin sui datus) is the original of the Zend kadúta, from this comes the modern Persian خدا khudá, which is identical with the Saxon and English God. In a similar manner, the Sanskrit स्वम् su + as, own, having given birth to the Persian khú + d, own, self, (the letter d being the pleonastic letter in Persian as in Latin) would lead to the belief that this last word is the original of the Saxon god and English good.

The truth of the foregoing inquiry is singularly confirmed by a reference to the Greek ; for the preposition εὖ good gives birth to the adjectives εὖς good, and the connection of ἰός his own with εὖ good, in the same way as सू su, good, with स्वम् su + as, his own, is thus brought to light perhaps for the first time. The Greek aspirate in the above and other instances takes the place of the Latin and Sanskrit s, and is therefore quite सुपथ supatha, an excellent, or good road. 2. Fitness, or propriety; as सुधा sukhádyā (fit, or proper to be eaten): wholesome. 3. Beauty; as सुवर्ण suranga (beautiful in colour): the orange. 4. Kindness; as सुहृत् suhrit (a kind heart): a friend. 5. Facility; as सुकर sukara (easily done, practicable). 6. Pleasingness; as सुख sukha (pleasing the senses): pleasure. 7. Superiority; as सुवर्ण suvarṇa (superior class, or colour (to silver): gold Compare दुर्धर्ष silver). 8. Intensity; as सूतीक्ष्ण sutīkṣhṇa, very acute. It is exactly the reverse of dur or dus, and agrees in signification and origin with the Greek εὖ.

दुः duh, दुश् dus, दुष् dush, दुस् dus, are forms which it must assume according to the consonant with which the word it is prefixed to may begin.

As it is exactly the reverse of सु su, it is employed to depreciate the nouns and adjectives to which it is joined; on this account it denotes 1. Vileness, or badness; as दुर्धरा duradhara, a bad road. 2. Unfitness or impropriety; as दुर्वालाप durálāpa (improper speech): abuse. 3. Difficulty; as दुश्चर duschara (difficult to go): impracticable. 4. Displeasingness; as दुःख duhkha (displeasing to the senses): pain. 5. Paucity; as दुर्बल durbala (of little strength): weak. 6. Inferiority; as दुर्धर्ष durvarṇa (inferior class, or colour (to gold) (compare सुवर्ण gold): silver. The Greek δυσ, and the Latin dis, seem to have a perfect analogy with it, in sense and origin.

Though, strictly speaking, the following words are adverbs, yet as they are very frequently used in the same manner as prepositions, they are on this account inserted immediately after them.

अधस् adhas. DOWN, DOWNWARDS, BELOW: figur. low, vile. अधः adhah, अधर् adhar, अधश्च adhas, अधो adho, are forms which it may occasionally assume when in composition.

quite distinct from the digamma. If there is any truth in this argument, the original sense of सु must be CLOSE OR NEAR, from which is derived the idea of own, and, from own, GOOD.

* Nearly all that has been said regarding सु su will, in a reversed sense, apply to this preposition. Whatever was distant, was considered as bad: in this way, foreign, outlandish, strange, &c. are always used by the vulgar with a deteriorating sense, and hence I have little doubt that this preposition is connected in origin with the Sanskrit दूर dūra, distant. The English word bad is evidently the same as the Persian bad; and if we had any evidence that the Scandinavian nations migrated from the shores of the Caspian after the intermixture of the Medes and Persians, I would almost without hesitation refer the origin of the Persian bad to some Syriac form connected with the Arabic buad, distance; for we know that the Pahlavi or border language was a mixture of a Syriac dialect with the old Persian, and this supposition would satisfactorily account for the many words apparently of the Semitic stock found in the Teutonic dialects. The original signification of दुर् dur must therefore be FAR, from which is derived the idea of BAD.

অন্তৰ্ antar, অন্তঃ antah, অন্তস্ antas, &c. Within, between, among. It is the same as the Latin inter

It is identified in origin and signification with the Greek ὑπὲρ, the Latin super, the Gothick ufar, and the English over.

D I C T I O N A R Y,

BENGALI, SANSKRIT, AND ENGLISH.

অ The first letter of the Hindu alphabet. It ought to have a short sound like the first a in America, but it is corrupted generally in Bengali into an obscure sound like the o in folly.

অ is prefixed to words as a particle of privation; as ধর্ম s. Justice, অধর্ম s. Injustice. If the word begin with a vowel, অন্ is substituted for অ; as in অনাগত a. (mfu.) Not come. The privative অ is used for three distinct purposes:—to denote something else than what the noun would otherwise express; as in অব্রহ্মণ s. Not a *Bráhma*n, from ব্রহ্মণ s. A *Bráhma*n; অনশ্ব s. Not a horse, from অশ্ব s. A horse:—to give a total change or opposite meaning to the word to which it is prefixed; as in অধর্ম s. Injustice, from ধর্ম s. Justice:—and simply to denote negatively what is expressed by the noun; as in অদৃষ্ট a. (mfu.) Unseen, from দৃষ্ট a. (mfu.) Seen, অকাৰণ a. (mfu.) Without cause, from কাৰণ s. A cause. Wilkins' Gr. pp. 534, 568.

অ as a Kridanta suffix (to roots) requires the change called Guna of the preceding radical vowel, and forms 1st. substantives or adjectives denoting a person endowed with the quality or performing the action implied by the verbal root to which it is subjoined, e. g. প্লব s. (m.) A ship, from R. প্ল To swim; সর্প s. A snake, from R. সৃপ To creep;—2d. masculine substantives expressive of a quality generally, e. g. ভয় s. Fear, from R. ভী To fear.

As a Taddhita suffix (to words) অ requires the change called Vridhhi of the preceding radical vowel, and serves to form, 1st. patronymics, e. g. দ্রোণদ s. The son of DRUPADA, from দ্রুপদ s. DRUPADA;—2d. abstract substantives of the neuter gender, as সৌহৃদ s. or সৌহৃদি s. Friendship, from সুহৃদ s. A friend;—3d. collective nouns of the neuter gender, e. g. আশ্ব s. A multitude of horses, from অশ্ব s. A horse,—4th. adjectives, e. g. সৌবর্ণ a. (mfu.) Golden, from সুবর্ণ s. Gold. Wilkins' Gr. §§ 766-768. 771-775. 781-783. 822. 823. 836.

অ s. (m.) A name of VISHNU.

ই The third letter of the Sanskrit alphabet. It is pronounced like the English i in lily, city, &c.

ই As a Kridanta termination, is affixed to the reiterative proper forms of the roots চন্ To go, প্ To fall, সহ To bear, to suffer, and বহ To bear, to carry, to form reiterative attributives, e. g. চাচলি a. (mfñ.) Who moves continually, পাপতি a. (mfñ.) Who falls repeatedly, &c. It is also used after roots ending in আ, ঞ্, or শ্, and likewise after those that drop their penultimate ; as দা To give, দদি a. (mfñ.) Who gives ; ধা To hold, দধি a. (mfñ.) Who holds ; ক্ To do, চক্রি a. (mfñ.) Who does or is active ; জন্ To produce, জজি a. (mfñ.) Who produces, productive, &c. Wilkins' Gr. p. 466.

—ই As a Kridanta suffix, also forms substantives with the roots দা To give, and ধা To keep, hold, preceded by অন্তর্ Within, or any other preposition; e. g. অন্তর্হি s. (f.) The keeping within, concealment, disappearance; সন্ধি s. (m.) Junction, union, &c. Wilkins' Gr. § 829. —See also § 834.

As a Taddhita suffix, ই requiring the change called Vridhhi of the first vowel of the primitive, forms patronymics with some words, e. g. বাহু s. (m.) VĀHU, a proper name, বাহুবি s. (mfn.) A descendant of VĀHU; কৃষ্ণ s. (m.) KRISHNA, কাষ্টি s. (mfn.) A descendant of KRISHNA. Wilkins' Gr. § 884.—The same is also applied to form a few adjectives of general relation to the primitive word from whence they are derived; as বীজ s. (n.) Seed, বৈজি a. (mfn.) Relating to seed, seminal, &c. Such adjectives form their feminines in ঐ. Wilkins' Gr. § 898.

ই indecl. (from হি) An emphatic Bengali particle—even, indeed, self, very; e. g. সমস্তই The whole indeed.

ই interj. Sans. An interjection of calling, amazement, anger, and compassion.

ই Root, 1. (অয়তি) To go, to go to or towards. II. 1. (In the A'tmanepadam or proper form, and with অধি prefixed, অধীতে) To read over, to study, to learn. 2. (In the Parasmaipadam or common form, এতি) To go, to move. This root may be compounded with a great number of prepositions, by which its meaning is modified; e. g. With অতি To pass beyond, to die; with অভি+অতি To go away; with বি+অতি To pass beyond; with সং+অতি To pass by (as time), to surpass; with অনু or with সং+অনু To follow; with অপ To go away; with অব To reach, to comprehend, to understand; with সং+অব To come together, to assemble; with অভি To come near, to approach; with আ, with অভি+আ, or with উপ+আ To approach; with প্রতি+আ To return; with সং+আ To come together; with উৎ or with অভি+উৎ To rise (as a luminary); with উপ, or with অভি+উপ, and also with সং+উপ To approach; with পরি To go round, to surround; with বি+পরি To be opposed to; with প্র To depart, to die; with প্রতি, or with সং+প্রতি To extol, to celebrate; with বি To go away; with সং To come together, to assemble.

ইংলণ্ডীয় a. (from England+ঐয়) English.

ইক As a Taddhita suffix, is very frequently used to form adjectives or derivative nouns from substantives: it generally requires the change called Vridhhi of the first vowel of the substantive to which it is subjoined. Ex. বসন্ত s. (m.) Spring, বাসন্তিক a. (mfn.) Belonging to the spring, vernal; বর্ষা s. (f.) The rainy season বার্ষিক a. (mfn.) Belonging to the rainy season; নিশা s. (f.) Night, নৈশিক a. (mfn.) Nightly, belonging to night; লোক s. (m.) World, লৌকিক or লৌকিক a. (mfn.) Worldly; পদ s. (m.) A foot, পদিক s. (m.) A foot soldier; পুরাণ s. (n.) A Purāna or historical poem, পৌরাণিক s. (m.) One who studies the Purānas. Wilkins' Gr. §. 903. As a Kridanta suffix, it serves to form some adjectives or nouns implying an agent from verbal roots, e. g. খনিক a. (mfn.) One who digs, from R. খন্ To dig; পাচিকা s. (f.) A female cook, from R. পচ্ To cook.
